Serving up lamb, from gate to plate

By CHRIS OWEN

IF you ever take a weekend drive to the Western Downs south of Roma, chances are you'll get to meet your next Sunday roast.

An innovative Seventeen Mile Rocks businesswoman and her farming family, based in the Maranoa, have come up with an initiative that takes food virtually straight from the paddock to your plate.

In this case the food is premium organic lamb – comparatively inexpensive lamb, at that, because Amy Tiller and her family say they have eliminated the “middle man” from the process of buying your meat.

“Amy Tiller: Selling lamb this way is a win-win situation not only for the farmers but the consumers as well.

Their operation is a simple one: Amy's father Adrian produces dorper lambs on his property which he transports to his daughter in Brisbane, who then delivers fresh to the householder.

Ms Tiller said the concept of “gate to plate” had become a popular and current means of distributing stock

“Many people now want to know the origins of their family's food and be reassured it has not travelled long distances to reach them,” she said.

“They also want to know how long the meat has been butchered

SERVED FRESH: Siwa Fresh is a new organic lamb and goat company started by Amy Tiller and her farmer dad Adrian Tiller.

and sitting on the shelf - which is something supermarkets cannot always provide.”

Ms Tiller said the family's new venture, called Siwa Fresh, started in March and had been growing in demand by word-of-mouth.

“When I began selling this product, I could not believe how many people were grateful to hear of us,” she said.

“It's hard work, but a lot of farmers are fed up travelling long distances with their stock and getting paid peanuts by the main distributors.

“Selling lamb this way is a win-win situation not only for the farmers but the consumers as well.”
